Here's a perfect example:

C. Bell, an Outdoors for All volunteer, writes:

"My student was angry, frustrated, and mad at the world. His T.B.I. (Traumatic Brain Injury) had left him learning to ski all over again. But he was determined to re-learn the skills he once had as a ski instructor. Placed with me, we would go out every week and work on skills. Every week he would get frustrated with himself and take it out on me. You would think that I would want to quit, but I believed in the power of patience. Every week he got a little better and better. We got closer and closer in our understanding of each other and became friends. As he learned to trust me he learned to trust himself and his skiing as well. His increasing skiing coordination began to show in other areas of his life. The last week of lessons he came to the hill all excited...He wanted to show me that he had a new Subaru! He was driving it! He and his father told me that the work we had been doing together had contributed to his confidence to take the driving test. The coordination skills paid off too! His SKIFORALL experience paid off - he came angry and frustrated but left that day happy, driving and talking about how he felt he could now ski alone with friends and family, thanks to SKIFORALL!"
